ANTHROPOLOGY TOWARD HISTORY

Culture and Work in a 19th-Century Maine Town

by RICHARD P. HORWITZ

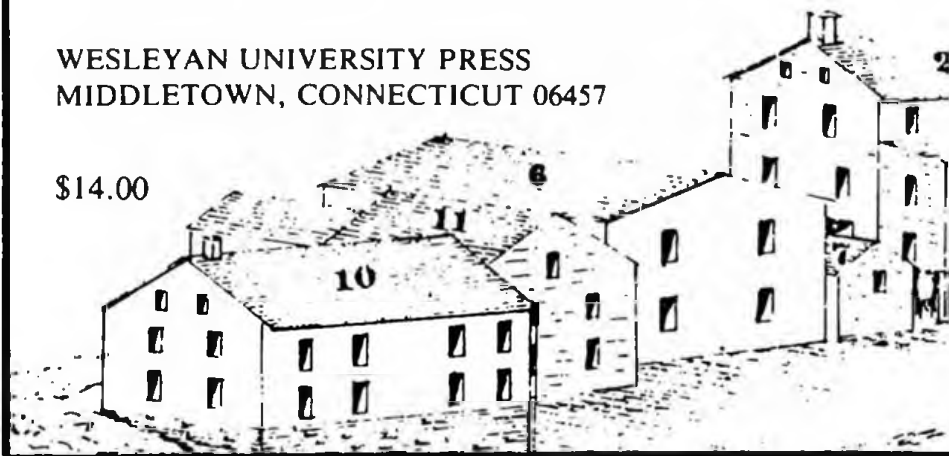

"Between 1820 and 1850, Winthrop, Me., grew from a rural village into a prosperous mill town. Recently, Richard P. Horwitz spent almost three years there trying to find out what life was really like during these 30 years of rapid change. He was not interested in traditional questions that conventional historians ask, about politics or social structure or economics. Horwitz . . . burrowed into local records, which are notably rich, looking for material that would tell him how the people of Winthrop felt about themselves in those days."

—The New York Times Book Review

"Horwitz's book is an impressive work of scholarship. Its method is innovative and boldly and brilliantly applied. The result provides us with insights, heretofore denied us by more conventional approaches, into the 'psyches' of the citizens of an early 19th-century community in transition from an agrarian to an industrial mode of life. One should not be surprised if future scholars treat this work as a model of its kind, seminal in importance. And perhaps I may be excused as a student of the history of the State of Maine, for injecting a personal and parochial observation: this work is far and away the single most impressive contribution to Maine-related scholarship in at least a century." —Ronald F. Banks, University of Maine
